Now Harry was so scared when h ound himself thrashing about in the fountain that his only thought was to ret out of it alive, but his hand happened to grab Judge Owl by the leg, and Harry hung on because he didn't know what else to do. And by hanging on he held Judge Owl under water so long the judge would have surely drowned in another minute if there hadn't come a noise at the door. That noise was a wheep, a cry of gladness and a bang. The whoop was from the throat of Billy, the cry of gladness was from the pegsy and the bang was a kick from the boot of the friendly young tramp who had helped Peggy and Billy save the house birds from the rough tramps. "Here we are safely back, and we have the house birds tucked under our coats," cried Peggy, as the door swang open under the force of the friendly young tramp's klok.

"And every one is mighty happy to get home out of the bilizzard," shouted Billy. He and Peggy opened their coats and out flew Mr. and Mrs. Rollo Cansary. Mr. and Mrs. Tom Parrakest and Hrownie Thrush, all of them stiff with the cold, but all smilling and joyous to he once inore in the anug. cozy sun-room garden. Harry hung on because he didn't know went Judge Owl to the bottom of the pool.

"Oh, let Judge Owl go!" shrieked Pegg! while Billy grabbed one of Harry's kicking legs.

"Deave my Harry alone. He is drowning that old witch owl," screamed Dinah, the colored housemaid, and she pulled at Billy's coat. Billy hung tight to the colored hoy, so tightly that he, too, would have been drawn into the founain by Harry's struggles if the friendly found tramp had not come to the rescue. The friendly young tramp had not come to the rescue. The friendly young tramp grabbed larry by the other leg. He gave a pull and a jerk, and out came Harry, spluttering and splashing and flapping like a fish on a hook. With him came Judge owl more dead than alive.

The judge was so filled with water that he could not breathe or stin. Billy knew from his bout scout work just that to do for a person who was drown-the grabbed Judge Owl, and held.
